On a certain occasion, Chief Justice Marshal was on his circuit in a boggy, and, passing through the forests of his nuttive S ate, was compelled to turn out of the beaten road into the woods to avoid an up, setting; when lo? another serious difficulity awaited him those. Suddenly he found his while wedged between two trees—The Judge looked around in vais for means of extreating himself from the durance vile. At length he thrust his hand into his pecket and drew out his pen-knife.—He eyed it for roune time with a possited expression, and thus solitoquised: 'No, this pen that will be the summary of the will be suffered to do it.' And then shaking his wise head, he wentou: 'No, this pen form his difficulty! knew not.' And just as he was making up his usind to descend from his buggy and patiently out away the supling, for one of the trees was muthing more, with the only instrument ta his possion, an old colored man none most op portunely to his researe. 'Why, bleas me!' said the Chief Justice, 'that was cleverly d.na. Why did I navith think of it?' Jack sailed, but said nothing 'Thank you, thank you, may good fellow. I am very much obliged to you,' said the grataful Judge, 'and here is a dollar for your trouble and kindness.' Jack was profuse in his thanks and bows; both worthles smiled, touched hats again most contreously and separated, the Chief Justice driving on before.

Jack peraned the same road on foot and toward erenisg arrived at the house of an icrtainment where the Chief Justice had dined that day. The landlord was easted in his piazza when Jack entered the gate, and this well-bred servant man approach ed, hat in hand, to make his obeisance, and an east of the roads, the crops in the neighbor the hight. After secording this favor, and observing that our sable friend was an intelligent and respectable man, the landlord condescended to hold some little conversation with Jack, respecting the state of the roads, the crops in the neighbor bood, and other matters and things within his comprehension. Thus encewarged, Jack become communicative, and related the adventure in the woods, such to the amusement of the landlord, who forthwith required if Jack knew to whom he had rendered this service.
